Memoirs of a Great Detective MURRAY
In a tangled swamp on a farm near Gait, in the county of Waterloo, Province of Ontario, Canada, in August, 1897, searchers were hunting for the body of a farmers wife. She had disappeared, and blood by the wood-pile and near the house told of a crime and the hiding of the body. One of the party beating the swamp came upon a half-dug grave. He kept silence as to his discovery, and, when night fell, he secreted himself in the thick brush near the grave and waited, in the faint hope that the murderer would return and finish his task, perchance bringing the body with him. It was bright moonlight overhead. In the thicket of the swamp all was gloom, save for a broken filtering of pale light where the underbrush and tall briar had been thinned out. It was a lonely, dismal place. An owls wailing and the swamp-frog croaking were the only sounds. The hours passed. Midnight came and went. Not even a lizard appeared by the grave. The watcher was about to creep closer and ease his limbs, when a rustle sounded in the brush, a noise like the wind swishing a bush. It ceased, then came again, then all was still. Suddenly, on the side of the grave farthest from the watcher, a figure crept swiftly out of the thicket and stood erect. The moon shone full upon him. He was tall and broad-shouldered, with a pose like that in the old-fashioned prints of heroic figures of the ancient wars.
