In the rich back drop of the farming cradle of the Ohio Valley, a peaceful lifestyle seems possible. Highly likely at least on the surface. Its 1973. And three young women want to discover their place in this male dominated world. In spite of the economic slowdown Roberta Birdie Alexander is determined their family business will both survive and thrive. She backs up that promise with hard work, and Alexanders foliage will become the standard for all of the Ohio Valley. Because if she works long enough and hard enough, her father will love her as much as he loves her older brothers. But Birdies dad seems determined to marry her off. In her Christian walk, Birdie approaches her relationship with her heavenly father in the same way. How much will she risk ... to hold onto her own will and secret sin of self-righteousness? Will losing her job wake her up? Losing a lifelong friend? A brother? Or will it take losing the very presence of God? Sara Brubaker, an only child, was two-years-old when an Old Order German Baptist couple adopted her. She's become a beautiful woman, and works as secretary for Alexanders Nursery and Greenhouse. Now she's torn between wanting to live in the normal world of fun and fashion, and joining the Dunkards to truly belong with her adoptive family. She loves the country living and the peaceful lifestyle. But the Anabaptist people dress so old fashioned. Does she really want to look ... Amish? Then she learns her parents have been keeping secrets. Saras dad side-steps her questions. Was the deception deliberate? Irene West, Birdies lifelong Sunday school friend, misses having a father figure around where is he anyway? She's become very boy crazy, which causes Birdie to struggle with the friendship and Irene to struggle with life. Birdie thinks its her job to shame Irene into acting more like a Christian. Will Birdie overcome her self-righteous nature before
