

Silk Hope, NC

Silk Hope, NC (made into a CBS film with Farrah Fawcett in 1999) is a humorous and poignant novel which is set 26 miles west of Chapel Hill, in a rural community. There is an old Victorian farmhouse with a tradition regarding the women in that family. That house, and what's left of the farm, are now owned by sisters Natalie and Frannie Vaughan. They've just inherited it because years earlier, the deed and wills were written so that the place could only be inherited by the women in the family. Natalie is practical and conservative, doesn't much care about her ancestors' wishes, and wants to sell the place. Frannie is younger, wilder, drinks too much, falls for too many bad men, wants to find her father who abandoned them years earlier; she can't hold a job, almost never uses the word no, when she should, but loves her family's history and wants to keep the house. As she tries to go straight and settle down, her life becomes a slapstick comedy of adventures---getting stuck inside a huge cardboard box inside an old warehouse, hauling pet pigs inside her own car, seducing two ex-con neighbors, and later pulling an antique pistol on them to run them off. Around all of this, she falls for the only good man she's ever been with---falls in love with her home, its land, her pond and the island in her pond, and dreams of living on that island. Though this novel could have been written melodramatically, Naumoff, author of many acclaimed literary novels, handles it skillfully and makes it work on many levels.
