

Al Capones Miami: Paradise or Purgatory?

Most have heard of Alphonse Al Gabriel Capone, also known as Scarface, who rose to become the undisputed king of the Chicago outfit during the Prohibition era. Most know he became one of Americas most infamous gangsters who earned the moniker Public Enemy Number One. His connection to New York and Chicago crime families, the running of gambling dens, whorehouses, and speakeasies, and reports of his committing assorted murders is legendary and readily acknowledged in myriad books, documentaries, and TV shows. But few know the intimate details about his time in Florida, especially the greater Miami area. It was here he hoped to escape Chicagos cold and windy winters, gangland retaliation wars, and incessant hounding by the law. Capone longed for paradise, where sunshine was a daily commodity, boating and fishing could be easily enjoyed along a sandy coast lapped by azure Atlantic waters, nightlife teemed with high class entertainment clubs and gambling houses, and relaxing by the pool was as easy as stepping out your back door. And so, Capone settled in South Florida where he purchased a luxurious home on Miami Beach, spent time before and after his imprisonment, ran his illegal businesses, and entertained the famous and infamous alike. It is here he also died. This story is about that time.
