

The Man (Annotated)

The novel begins with a Fore-glimpse or preface, where the two main characters Miss Stephen Norman and Harold An Wolf are sitting in the graveyard of their towns church, eavesdropping on the conversation of two little girls below them, Marjorie and Susan. Marjorie declares, I would rather be an angel than a God! and explains that she would rather obey orders than give them. Susan disagrees, and says that she would rather be a God so that she could be at the top of everything and give orders to the angels. Upon listening to their conversation, Harold tells Stephen that he agrees with Marjories point of view, whereas Stephen takes Susans side. Harold tells Stephen that a woman cannot be a God because she is not just enough, and the two have a slight argument about it, and the two part ways. This fore-glimpse assigns the trait of dominance to Stephen, and submission to Harold.
