

When Students Write (VHS)

You can read books or attend workshops about how to teach writing, but there's no substitute for seeing master teachers put ideas into practice with real kids. When Students Write takes us into the classrooms at Baileys Elementary School in the outskirts of Washington, DC, where teachers wrestle with the questions of what it means to become an effective writer and what is a teacher's role in developing students' competence as writers. The four videotapes cover all the practical components necessary for establishing and implementing a successful writing workshop, including the importance of choice, creating a risk-taking environment, the difference between skills and craft, the writer's notebook, the writing conference, revision, the role of literature, and much more. When used in conjunction with the authors' books, Craft Lessons and Nonfiction Craft Lessons, these videotapes provide a practical resource on how best to teach writing.

Tape 1: Building a Writing Community Students need to assimilate a daunting number of skills as they become competent writers. And this doesn't happen overnight. Writing teachers need to create a community where students can live as writers, find their voices, and take the kinds of risks that allow them to develop competence as writers. In this tape, the teachers and principal at Baileys Elementary School show how they create that atmosphere. Their environment is rooted in the ongoing professional development that is an integral part of this school. Viewers will see how each student's identity as a writer permeates the entire school and cuts across the curriculum.

Tape 2: Teaching Writing Skills in Context Although writing encompasses a bundle of skills, it could be roughly divided into two main branches—composing (craft) and editing (mechanics). In this tape, we explore how skilled writing teachers teach mechanics such as contractions and spelling. At Baileys the teachers demonstrate how important skills are taught in the context of an ongoing writing workshop. We see what management tools they use to assess students needs in this area and how they situate skill teaching in a larger real-world context: What is your purpose for this piece of writing? Who is going to read this? How can we make this writing as reader-friendly as possible? Tape 3: Literature That Supports Writing The writing in a classroom can only be as good as the literature that surrounds and sustains it. This videotape focuses on the reading-writing connection. Teachers at Baileys continuously draw on a variety of literature--poems, picture books, chapter books--to nourish their students. Literature can be used to spark writing ideas, but at Baileys the teachers go a step further: in many classrooms, a kind of deep reading takes place where teachers and students delve into a text to study an authors technique. Deep reading helps students get a feel for the structures and rhythms of written language and learn how texts are crafted from the inside out. Tape 4: Craft Lessons to Stretch Young Writers What exactly is a craft lesson? How (and when) might you teach it? How can you assess the needs of your students so you know which craft lessons to teach? Nothing energizes a classroom more than when students see their own writing getting stronger. Teachers who help students add writing strategies to their toolbox provide them with powerful skills they will use for the rest of their lives. In this tape the teachers at Baileys open up their classrooms and show the power of craft lessons to improve the quality of student writing. These demonstrations give even inexperienced teachers an entry into the world of writing workshop.
